"Synopsis A biography of the young actor discusses his childhood in Connecticut, his early acting roles, his success on 'Dawson's Creek,' and his future career plans. Leseprobe. Abdruck erfolgt mit freundlicher Genehmigung der Rechteinhaber. Alle Rechte vorbehalten. James Van Der Beek1Opening LinesMost of James Van Der Beek's fans know him as the sensitive, small-town film buff of Capeside, Massachusetts. What many may not know is that James's real upbringing is quite similar to the image he portrays on TV. Dawson Leery's idyllic life on the small screen seems to mirror the young James's coming of age to a T. 'Dawson reminds me of myself when I was fifteen,' said James. 'I grew up in a small New England town and vacationed on Cape Cod, where the show takes place, and we both come from loving, supportive homes.' Looking at his blond crop of hair and pretty-boy features, it's hard to believe that James was ever anything other than a star. Of course, there was a time when fame and fortune seemed light-years away, and his biggest concern wasn't his next feature film, but what Mom had packed in his lunch box. Considering that he's only twenty-two years of age, that time doesn't seem all that long ago.

BRINGING UP DAWSON

Born on March 8, 1977, to Jim and Melinda Van Der Beek, James had the run of the nursery. As the Van Der Beeks' first baby, he was named after his father and was the source of much consternation and sleepless nights for his first-time parents. Bringing up baby would not be an easy feat. Jim and Melinda worried incessantly about their newborn, struggling with everything from nightly feedings to early morning wake-up calls. Despite the stress of parenthood, his family managed to create a homey and nurturing environment for James. It was in that modest 'starter' home that James took his initial steps and uttered his very first syllables. By reading to him and stimulating his mind with books and toys, the Van Der Beeks provided their young son with an outlet for his vivid imagination. From an early age, Jim and Melinda taught their son to value his creativity and instilled in him the confidence to express his feelings and ideas. Despite the fact that both his parents worked full-time jobs, James's early years saw him always at the center of attention. Jim Van Der Beek was a busy account manager for Southern New England Telecommunications Corporation, while his mom had her hands full running her own gymnastics studio. Yet, even when his two younger siblings, Jared and Juliana, came into the picture, James never felt like a third wheel on the family wagon. Lavishing him with all the extra affection they could muster, his parents helped him weather the transition from being an only child to an older brother with relative ease. Perhaps that's why James never fell prey to the resentful-older-child syndrome. Instead of feeling jealous and insecure upon the arrival of the newborns, he welcomed the camaraderie that came with having a large family. Nowhere is this absence of sibling rivalry more evident than in James's own descriptions of Jared and Juliana. 'My brother is a phenomenal athlete so he's got his own thing that he excels at, completely independent of what I do,' he told E! 'And my sister as well. I mean really she's made a name for herself. She's a straight-A student, the smartest kid and really great.' With all the emphasis placed on education and learning in the Van Der Beek household, finding out that James had dyslexia came as a blow to his family. Yet, while many people suffer great hardships as a result of this learning disability, James was lucky that the problem was discovered so quickly. Had it gone undetected and untreated, it could have gravely impaired James's reading comprehension and might very well have prevented him from living up to his full potential. Fortunately, his dyslexia was diagnosed and treated while he was still a small tyke. 'They caught it while I was in kindergarten; [I learned to read] in a special experimental class,' he explained to Teen People. 'I didn't even know I was dyslexic until I was a junior in high school.'

SMALL TOWN LIVING Nestled snugly in the quiet, sleepy ville of Cheshire, Connecticut, the Van Der Beek home was a model of Norman Rockwell's America. With a population of 26,892 and more white picket fences than anyone would care to count, Cheshire is an ideal place to build a home and raise children. Jim and Melinda did well to choose this family-friendly locale as their nesting ground. Originally, Cheshire was a manufacturing town, producing everything from ivory combs to buttons. As the town's population grew, small businesses began to boom, houses of worship were erected and family homes were built on barren land. Industrialization would see Cheshire transform from a tiny village, complete with a trolley line, to a bustling town with its very own system of buses. Despite the advances, a bucolic atmosphere pervades the town to this day. Due in large part to the efforts of its historical society, Cheshire has lost none of its old-world charm. Many of the original estates have been preserved, and big business still runs a close second to the mom-and-pop operations lining the shopping district. Developing in its diversity every day, the community has an open-door policy for all newcomers. This diversity was very important to the Van Der Beeks, as they loathed the idea of sheltering James from people of various cultures and backgrounds. Even though safety and education were important, making sure that their children were versed in the ways of the world was also high on their list of priorities. It was in the quaint town of Cheshire, then, that Jim and Melinda found the perfect combination. The town fosters strong bonds between the residents, many of whom smile and greet one another in passing. Since manners are a matter of course in every small community, Cheshire kids learn to be polite from a young age. If they transgress the bounds of good behavior, chances are their mothers will be hearing about it the next day. This New England upbringing is often the first thing that strikes reporters upon meeting the disarmingly polite and charming young actor for the first time. Growing up in Cheshire, James developed the confidence and sense of belonging that comes from knowing all your neighbors and seeing the same friendly faces every day. From riding his bike to the corner grocery store to doing back flips at the local pool, James remembers his younger days with the fondness of someone who's been away from home for a long time and is counting the days until his return.

THE ROOTS OF SUCCESS While most thespians credit their first high school plays with sparking their love of applause, James caught the acting bug even earlier than that. His mother was actually the first to introduce him to the joys of taking center stage. A former Broadway dancer, Melinda always cited dancing as her first love. Although she enjoyed regaling her family with tales of her life in the limelight, marriage and kids had required that she put away her dreams of the Great White Way. Instead, she channeled her love of dance into opening a small gymnastics studio near the family home. 'My mom staged gymnastic recitals, where a whole class of kids would come onstage and do a routine set to music,' James recounted to Interview magazine. 'I remember being onstage for a recital when I was six, so performing wasn't anything foreign to me once I started doing theater.' But even though Melinda would encourage James and Jared to perform, it was Juliana who she thought would be the one to carry on the dancing legacy. Unfortunately, Juliana didn't share her mother's interest, and Melinda had to accept that there was not going to be another dancer in the family. Little did she know that her passion for the arts was rubbing off on young James. And as he matured he showed a greater interest in showcasing his many talents. 'I was...".
